Mr. White, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred, the 13th instant, the treaty with the Comanche and Wicchetaw Indians, reported the same without amendment.

The treaty was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

On motion by Mr. White.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. White, from the same committee, to whom was referred the treaty with the Caddo Nation, reported it without amendment.

The treaty was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been made thereto, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. White submitted the following resolution:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring), That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States of America and the Caddo Nation of Indians, concluded at the agency house in the said nation, the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, together with the articles supplementary thereto, concluded at the time and place aforesaid.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, by unanimous consent; and

On the question to agree thereto,

It was determined in the affirmative, { Yeas 38

WASHINGTON, February 29, 1836.

To the Senate :

I nominate to the Senate Thomas W. Oldfield to be consul of the United States for Lyons, in France, in the place of Samuel Allinson, resigned.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, February 29, 1836.

The messages were severally read.

Ordered, That the message nominating William Armstrong be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Ordered, That the message nominating Thomas W. Oldfield be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. Clay, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following report :

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the nomination of Andrew Stevenson, of Virginia, as minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to Great Britain, have, according to order, had the same under consideration, and now beg leave to report.

That on the 30th May, 1834, Andrew Stevenson was nominated for the same office, and on the 24th of the succeeding month he was rejected by the Senate ; that Martin Van Buren, of New York, had been previously nominated for the same office, and on the 25th January, 1832, had been rejected by the Senate ; that it remained vacant from this period until the nomination of Mr. Stevenson, and it has continued vacant from the time of his rejection. This office has therefore been unoccupied during the term of more than four years.

When Mr. Stevenson was first nominated he was Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, which office he resigned on the — day of June, 1834. Whilst that nomination was under consideration it appeared to the Senate that the Secretary of State had, on the 15th day of March, 1833, addressed an official note to Mr. Stevenson, in which the Secretary said : “ I am directed by the President to inform you, confidentially, that as soon as advices shall be received that the British Government consent to open negotiations with this, which are daily expected, it is his intention to offer you the place of minister plenipotentiary to the Court of St. James ; and he requests that should this appointment be agreeable to you, you will hold yourself in readiness to embark in the course of the summer. I congratulate you, sir, on this mark of the President’s confidence.” This note was received by Mr. Stevenson ; but if he returned a direct answer it did not appear to the Senate.

Subsequent to the receipt of this note, in April, 1833, Mr. Stevenson was elected a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia, took his seat at the commencement of the session of Congress in the December following, was elected Speaker of the House, and continued to discharge the duties of that office until he resigned it as hereinbefore stated.

It appeared further to the Senate that shortly after Mr. Stevenson received the note of the Secretary of State, before mentioned, he had an interview and consultation with Mr. Thomas Ritchie, his friend and neighbor, and the editor of a leading newspaper supporting the administration, published at Richmond, in Virginia, on the subject of the contents of that note. In that interview Mr. Ritchie, in a letter addressed to Mr. Stevenson, in June, 1834, says it struck him that the President might appoint Mr. Stevenson in case the contingency happened during the recess and not send him, but Mr. Livingston, to France. “ I suggested (says he) that these appointments ought not and could not be made, according to the spirit of the Constitution, during the recess of the Senate. You (Mr. Stevenson) promptly and cordially concurred in this view of the subject, and I then determined to write to a friend in Washington for the purpose of laying this view before the President himself. You approved of my doing so, and in fact we agreed perfectly in the course to be taken. We determined to take no notice of Mr. Livingston’s letter—to act yourself as if no such letter had been written ; that it would be best not to offer to accept the appointment if made in the summer, and to wait the action of the Senate, &c.”

In pursuance of the plan thus arranged between Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Ritchie the latter, in March, 1833, addressed two letters to Mr. W. B. Lewis, at the city of Washington, who was the friend and enjoyed the confidence of the President, and held the office of Auditor. Extracts from these letters were furnished by Mr. Lewis and presented to the Senate on the occasion of the first nomination of Mr. Stevenson. Mr. Ritchie says to Mr. Lewis: "I am about to address you on a subject which has caused much speculation among our friends and great uneasiness in my bosom. I speak to you as a friend, and without the slightest reserve. The papers have recently spoken of a batch of appointments which the President is about to make, embracing the two highest missions to European courts and the two highest seats in his Cabinet. I have conversed freely with our friend Stevenson upon them, and I have this day communicated to him my intention to write to you and to lay before you my own views of the matter.

"We have the utmost confidence in the virtue of General Jackson. We have no idea that he would arrogate to himself new powers at the expense of the other Departments of the Government. His generous ambition has been fully satisfied. He has nothing more to ask of his country than her verdict of approbation when he lays down the high and difficult office with which he is intrusted. We all know it, and every candid individual admits it. We believe that the course he may pursue will be with a single eye to the public interest. But whilst we dismiss all apprehensions that he will designedly abuse his authority, we wish at the same time, that he should do no act which may be plead, hereafter, by an unworthy successor, in justification of his acts. In this last term of his administration, we wish to see no precedent set which may be perverted in future times; we desire it on our own account, as well as that of our country. We wish to see his administration set in glory, and we wish to see our country benefited, in all time to come, by his pure example. But this cannot be, if any error should be committed against principle, even from the best of motives; if any authority should be assumed which does not fairly belong to him, or even if any doubtful power should be exercised upon any delicate branch of the Constitution, his high popularity would only make it more current. One of the highest powers which attaches to the Executive is that of appointment; over its exercise is accordingly thrown, and wisely thrown, the check of concurrence by the Senate. Now, sir, doubts do exist whether the vacancy in the missions to London and Paris did not originally occur during the recess of the Senate; secondly, whether the vacancy does not still exist; and thirdly, whether it ought now to be filled without a consultation with the Senate."

The letters from which these extracts were taken having been written expressly with a view of being laid before the President, there can be no doubt that it was done. Their main object, that of preventing the appointment of Mr. Stevenson in the vacation of the Senate, was secured. The President forebore to make it, and waited until the Senate assembled at the ensuing session before the nomination was made.

It is stated by the President in his message of the 13th June, 1834, communicating the note of the Secretary of State to Mr. Stevenson, that the negotiations to which it refers were commenced early in April, 1833, in the city of Washington, instead of London, and as they have been since conducted here, no further communication was made to Mr. Stevenson. What these negotiations were has not been stated. Whatever they might have been, the residence of a minister of the United States at London, at all times, is obviously proper; and that the appointment of Mr. Stevenson did not depend upon any particular negotiations is manifest from the fact of his having been finally nominated to the office. If the President had abandoned all intention of sending him to England, inasmuch as he had been requested to hold himself in readiness to go, during the summer of 1833, and had not declined the offer, he would probably have been notified of the change in the views of the President.

The Senate saw, therefore, that a promise of the mission to Great Britain had been communicated to Mr. Stevenson on the 15th March, 1833. They saw an indirect intervention, with Mr. Stevenson's knowledge and acquiescence, to prevail on the President not to make the appointment in the vacation of the Senate, in accommodation to the views of Mr. Stevenson and his friend Mr. Ritchie. They saw that the President did forbear to make the appointment in the vacation of the Senate. And they saw the final execution of the promise, so far as it depended upon the Executive, by his nomination on the 30th May, 1834. During this long interval he had been elected by the people of a Congressional district in Virginia as their representative, ignorant of his having possession of such an official promise; he had been elected under like ignorance by the House of Representatives as their Speaker, and in that station had performed all the highly important duties incident to it. That office, at all times one of great influence, possessed more than ordinary weight in the session of 1833-'4. The President some time before its commencement had directed the public deposits to be withdrawn from the Bank of the United States and placed in the local banks. That measure excited deep and general sensation throughout the country, divided the people, divided the constitutional advisers of the President, divided Congress, and became a subject of warm and animated discussion in both houses. It was at this extraordinary period that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, invested with the power of appointing and arranging the committees of the House, and wielding a great influence, secretly held a written official promise of the most important mission abroad, everybody being ignorant of the fact except himself, the President, the Secretary of State, and a few confidential friends.

It was under these circumstances that his nomination came up for consideration in the Senate. It is a fundamental principle of free Governments that, in order to preserve the purity of their administration, each of the three departments into which, according to all safe maxims they are divided, should be kept independent of and without the influence of the others. But, if the head of one of those Departments may, at a critical period, confidentially present, and for a long period of time hold up to the presiding officer of the popular branch of another, the powerful inducement of a splendid foreign mission, is there not imminent danger of undue subserviency—of a failure of that presiding officer faithfully and independently to discharge the high duties of this exalted station?

The Senate thought there was, and withheld its advice and consent to the nomination of Mr. Stevenson as minister to Great Britain. And now, after the lapse of near two years, with all the circumstances by which his original nomination was attended remaining in full force, but with considerable individual variations in the composition of the Senate, the same individual is again nominated by the President for the same office. Doubtless a place, more than any other foreign appointment, important to be constantly occupied, has not been kept vacant with a view to, or in expectation of, any such variations. Doubtless, in the ample field for selection, which the intelligence and patriotism of near fifteen millions of people offer, some individual equally well qualified with, and less exceptionable than, Mr. Stevenson, might be designated to represent the United States at the Court of St. James. Doubtless no personal feelings or wishes to achieve a triumph over the Senate can have prompted the renewal of this nomination.

Whatever may have been its motives, the committee neither know nor have anything to do with them. They are not themselves aware of any peculiar fitness in Mr. Stevenson, or any absolute necessity of deputing him, and only him, as the minister of the United States to Great Britain. In ordinary times, the fact of his being unacceptable to a large portion of the Senate, even if that did not constitute an actual majority, would be regarded as deserving of consideration. In a free Government it should be the aim of those who administer it to promote harmony in the public councils and satisfaction among the people.

The Senate of the United States is supposed, by the theory of the Constitution, to be as free and independent in the exercise of its judgment on nominations submitted to its consideration, as the President is in proposing them. Each of the two components of the appointing power acts upon its own sense of duty, and upon its own responsibility. The Senate has no right to require the President to nominate any particular individual, and the President has no right to require the Senate to confirm any particular nomination. When the Senate has once decided upon a nomination, there ought to be an end of the matter.

Prior to the present administration, instances of renomination were rare, and are believed to have occurred only when some indication was given from the Senate of a desire that it should take place. It has of late become much more frequent. The practice is liable to great abuses. A President disposed to advance favorites to public offices, and finding a Senate disagreeing with him as to their fitness, may forbear for a long time to the detriment of the public service to nominate any person to fill them, until from those changes of individual members to which all collective bodies are liable, a Senate happens to be formed more yielding and complying. When a nomination is once rejected, the exact state of the votes of the Senate is known to the President, and if the practice of renomination is indulged, in process of time there will be danger of existence, or the imputation of corruption. The committee think that the practice ought to be resisted; that when the Senate has once rejected an individual nomination, the decision ought to be held as final and conclusive, and that it ought not to confirm the nomination of the same person when again made for the same office, without strong special cause. In the present case no such cause is alleged or known to exist, whilst all the considerations which formerly opposed the confirmation of Mr. Stevenson continue in unabated strength. The committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate do not advise and consent to the appointment of Andrew Stevenson as minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to Great Britain.

The report was read.

Ordered, That it be printed in confidence for the use of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the nomination of Andrew Stevenson; and,

MONDAY, MAY 16, 1836.

The following messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration and action of the Senate, a treaty concluded on the 9th inst. with certain bands of Chippewa Indians in Michigan.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, May 14, 1836.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit for the consideration of the Senate three treaties concluded with certain bands of Pottawatamie Indians in the State of Indiana.

I transmit also a report from the Secretary of War inclosing the instructions under which these treaties were negotiated.

I would remark that the fourth article of each treaty provides for the appointment of a commissioner and the payment of the debts due by the Indians. There is no limitation upon the amount of these debts, though it is obvious from these instructions that the commissioner should have limited the amount to be applied to this object, otherwise the whole fund might be exhausted, and the Indians left without the means of living. I therefore recommend either that the Senate limit the amount, at their discretion, or that they provide by resolution that the whole purchase money be paid to the Indians, leaving to them the adjustment of their debts.

ANDREW JACKSON.

MAY 14, 1836.

The messages and the accompanying treaties were read.

Ordered, That they severally be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that the treaties.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate to the Senate James H. Williams, of Massachusetts, to be consul of the United States for the port of Sydney, in New South Wales.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, May 14, 1836.

The message was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. Davis, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the messages of the 30th April nominating Franklin Davis and Abraham P. Farren and others, reported.

Whereupon

Resolved, That the Senate do advise and consent to the appointment of Abraham P. Farren, William Turner, James B. C. Thornton, Thomas Gatewood.

Ordered, That the nomination of Franklin Davis lie on the table.

The treaty with the Cherokee Indians was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, together with the amendments reported thereto.

On the question to agree to the first amendment in the following words: Strike out all after "adjudicated" in article seven, line two, to the word "by" in the third line.

The question was put, Shall these words "by Gen'l William Carroll and John F. Schermerborn, or" stand part of the article?

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18, 1836.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution for the ratification of the Cherokee treaty.

A motion was made by Mr. Clay to strike out all the resolution after the word "Resolved," and to insert:

That the instrument of writing purporting to be a treaty concluded at New Echota on the twenty-ninth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, between the United States and the chiefs, headmen, and people of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and the supplementary articles thereto annexed, were not made and concluded by authority on the part of the Cherokee tribe competent to bind it, and, therefore without reference to the terms and conditions of the said agreement and supplementary articles, the Senate cannot consent to and advise the ratification thereof as a valid treaty binding upon the Cherokee tribe or nation.

Resolved, That the Senate do advise the President to open a new negotiation with the Cherokees on the east side of the Mississippi, or with persons invested by them with full powers to treat in their behalf, upon the basis of a cession of the whole country of the Cherokees on the east side of the Mississippi, or any part thereof, that may be deemed most expedient and practicable.
